Frank Bessac was a Fulbright scholar studying in Inner Mongolia when communist forces began organizing raids across China. He embarked on what became an 11-month, 1,500-mile trek to seek asylum in Tibet. His autobiographical account of the trip appeared in Life magazine and vividly portrayed his harrowing tale of survival. This included the shooting and beheading of three men traveling in his party. Before setting off on the last leg of his journey, he received a Buddhist blessing from Tenzin Gyatso, who later became the 14th Dalai Lama. Bessac was born in Lodi, CA. He received a bachelor's degree in history from College of the Pacific before joining the Army in 1943. He received his master's degree in anthropology from the University of California, Berkeley, and his doctorate from the University of Wisconsin. He taught at the University of Montana, Missoula, from 1967–1989, when he became a professor emeritus. He is survived by his wife of 59 years and five children.
